

Comments of Religious Freedom Coalition Chairman William J. Murray

Forum on Chinese Communist Party

The Capitol, Washington, DC - July 21, 2005

It is wishful thinking on the part of the current American administration that China actually has a communist government. Both the Administration and various conservative and liberal think tanks believe free enterprise, free trade and the rise of a consumer class in China will lead to the collapse of the communist government as it did in other areas of the world. This thought process is not realistic because the government of China is not communistic, but rather National Socialist or fascist in nature.

Unlike communism, fascism is totally compatible with capitalism and free trade. The fascist government of Spain lasted decades as have numerous other fascist regimes around the world. Because fascism is compatible with capitalism most fascist regimes have ended only by revolution or outside military force. A very good example was the fascist regime of Saddam Hussein in Iraq. Without US intervention this brutal fascist regime could have lasted for generations.

The Mullah led fascists of Iran utilize free trade and the free enterprise system to enhance their military might and consolidate their power, much like the Chinese fascists who masquerade as communists. Fascism is alive in the world today.

Unable to remain in power, or even sustain itself, through substance of thought or philosophy, the CCP has become an evil cult. Like religious fanatics CCP members chant their unproven dogma at meetings and deny all others freedom of thought and speech. Those who think for themselves are expelled and often imprisoned or even executed. The underlying truth of the CCP has been the murder of millions of innocents. CCP members refer to death as "going to see Marx."

The current and past American administrations and all other Western governments have failed to understand the threat of the cultish nature of the CCP and the implications of what is in reality a fascist religious cult running the government of the most populous nation on Earth.

The CCP leadership believes violence is the answer to all problems it faces. Using the trillions of dollars received from exports to the United States, the fascists of China are building a deadly modern military that is superior to any in the world other than that of the United States. Now ready to flex its new military muscle, financed by the America consumer, the CCP has announced to the world its plan to use military force against Taiwan.

On numerous discussion panels I have endured the ignorance of economic conservatives who equate monetary freedom with social good. Their argument is simplistic at its best and can be summed up as follows: "As China becomes wealthier and the middle class expands, the Communist Party will lose its grip and slowly fade away."

In other words they believe the fascist leaders of China will give up their mansions, private jets and chauffeured limousines and sort of wander off in order to allow the people to live free. This is an Alice in Wonderland scenario designed to alleviate the guilt of American capitalists for making money off the misery of the Chinese people.

Rather than to sit idly by using the labor of the Chinese people to make cheap consumer goods, the West must awaken to the threat of violence by a decaying fascist regime. Rather than sell modern arms to China's ruling warlords, the West should be shipping the idea of freedom to the Chinese people.

There is no progress toward democratization in China; indeed the trend is in the other direction. American technology is used to restrain freedom and filter information from the Chinese people. Thanks to American software companies, the Chinese people cannot read the news on the Internet site of the organization I chair, the Religious Freedom Coalition, nor the websites of most of the congressmen and Senators who occupy the building behind me. Nor can they view the Nine Commentaries which have caused so many to abandon the Communist Party in the past year.

The Western media should share a responsibility to allow Americans and others to know the truth of the evil cult in China which they finance with their consumer dollars. The CCP should not be financed by the West; it should be strangled much like it strangles the life from the people of China.
